Insect Conditions in the Pacific Northwest Region

Four years of less-than-normal precipitation continue to cause increasing insect effects on forests in the Pacific Northwest. Although western spruce budworm has decreased throughout Oregon in 1989, mortality caused by the major bark beetle species increased significantly. The drought has had the greatest effect in southwest and eastern Oregon.

Douglas-fir beetle-caused mortality increased in eastern Oregon, but was down in eastern Washington. Douglas-fir beetle populations continue to increase in the Blue Mountain Forests, especially in the areas with past fires and western spruce budworm defoliation. Douglas-fir mortality occurred on 324,000 acres (19 million cubic feet).

Fir-engraver caused mortality in true fir was three to five times higher in both eastern Washington and eastern Oregon. Mortality occurred on 834,000 acres (23.6 million cubic feet) as compared to 267,000 (5.7 million cubic feet) in 1988.

The number of lodgepole pines killed by mountain pine beetle was less than one quarter of the previous year in central Oregon, but was up slightly in intensity in eastern Washington and the Malheur National Forest. Mountain pine beetle-caused ponderosa pine mortality increased throughout the east side of the Region.

Western pine beetle caused mortality in ponderosa pine increased in both States. Generally, western pine beetles attack large sawlog ponderosa pine, but this year there was increased mortality to small saw log ponderosa pine in southern and eastern Oregon.

Because of drought conditions in southern Oregon, flatheaded wood borer caused significant mortality in mature old Douglas-fir, and western pine beetle killed significant numbers of ponderosa pine at the lower elevations.

Western spruce budworm defoliation decreased by 1.3 million acres to 1.4 million acres in Oregon, but increased sixty per cent in Washington to 360,000 acres. The Oregon budworm outbreak has continued to decline since 1986. The large suppression projects areas treated with B.t. in 1988 showed little or no defoliation from the air in 1989. A small pilot project (4,000 acres) using B.t. (Foray 48LV) at 16 BIU comparing 64 fl oz and 43 fl oz per acre was completed on the Pine Ranger District of the Wallowa-Whitman National Forest. An operational suppression project of 7,454 acres was conducted on the Clackamas Ranger District of the Mt Hood National Forest by helicopter using Dipel 6L at 16 BIU. The mean post-treatment population density was 5.5 larvae per mid-crown branch.

Larval sampling of Douglas-fir tussock moth showed increasing populations at suboutbreak levels on the Pine Ranger District. No defoliation was detected.

Pandora moth populations were found in second growth ponderosa pine and lodgepole pine near Sun River in central Oregon.

No new gypsy moth infestations were detected in the Region using pheromone traps. Eradication efforts were conducted by spraying from the ground around two private residences in Lake Oswego near Portland, Oregon, and one property in Cave Junction, Oregon.

Cone and seed insects are a major factor reducing production in Douglas-fir seed orchards in Oregon and Washington. A feasibility demonstration of aerial application and an insecticide recommendation was conducted at the Heather Seed Orchard on the Willamette National Forest in Oregon. Approximately 85% of the potential good seed per cone was saved.

Disease Conditions in the Pacific Northwest Region

Disease conditions in the Pacific Northwest are assessed by routine stand examinations conducted by Agency personnel or during ground-based pest surveys conducted by Forest Pest Management personnel.

Root diseases are among the most serious pest problems in Washington and Oregon forests because of the magnitude of losses and the difficulty of treatment. They are diseases of the site and may intensify from one rotation to the next. Annual losses to root disease on all ownerships has been estimated at over 180 million cubic feet. Approximately 7.5% of the acreage of commercial forest land on all ownerships is affected by root disease. It is estimated that production is reduced by 50% on those affected acres.

Laminated root rot is the most serious disease of forests west of the Cascade crest and accounts for 60% of all root disease losses. It is estimated to have removed approximately 8% of the Douglas-fir type west of the Cascades from full production. Damage was also severe in some Eastside grand and white fir stands. Tolerant, resistant, and immune species were favored or planted to suppress this disease.

Annosus root disease was responsible for extensive losses in many partially cut white and grand fir stands in eastern Washington and Oregon. Most loss was due to tree mortality. Severity is expected to increase with time. Annosus root disease was observed with increasing frequency in ponderosa pine stands on very dry sites in southeastern Oregon. Losses were severe in some high value seed orchards. Concern about the impacts of annosus root disease in mountain hemlock and Pacific silver fir in high elevation stands in the Cascades increased.

Armillaria root disease caused serious losses in later seral stage/early climax plant communities east of the Cascades. Losses west of the Cascades were usually confined to stressed stands, such as those planted with off-site stock.

Impact of dwarf mistletoes on conifers remained high. Dwarf mistletoes were present on approximately 9.5 million acres and caused an estimated loss of 131 million cubic feet of timber in 1989. Most of the damage from dwarf mistletoes occurred east of the Cascade crest. Douglas-fir dwarf mistletoe was the most damaging forest tree disease in Eastside stands, infecting 42% of the host type.

Annual losses of western white and sugar pines from white pine blister rust have been estimated at 15 million cubic feet. Rust resistant planting stock was available for regenerating stands. Interest in pruning white pine stands to control the disease continued to increase.

Increased moisture during the year contributed to increased observations of foliar diseases. Top, branch, and whole-tree mortality associated with drought and secondarily with complexes of canker fungi were reported at much lower levels than during the two previous years.
